A SMALL BUT BUSY WORLD

Your body is a collection of microbes, fungi, viruses and even other animals. In fact, in the general vicinity of your nose, there are right now at least two species of microscopic mites living in your pores.

Mites are relatives of ticks, spiders, scorpions and other arachnids. Over 48,000 species have been described. Around 65 of them belong to the genus Demodex, and two of those live on your skin. These two species are evolution's special gift to you. They live on humans and humans alone. Other Demodex mites have similarly specific preferences: D.canis, for example, is a dog-lover.

To most of us, they look like any other mite and while you have probably never seen one at all, these weird creatures are almost certainly the animals we spend the most time with. They live in our hair follicles, most commonly the ones on our face and scalp, buried head-down, eating the oils we secrete, hooking up with each other near the surface, and occasionally crawling about the skin at night.

While we all have them, Demodex mites can be linked to some of the most challenging skin and scalp problems and can wreak havoc in terms of your dermal health.

DEMODEX MITES

Demodex mites are microscopic parasites that live under hair follicles and in oil glands, and have been identified as the leading contributor to many hair and skin problems.

Substantial numbers of Demodex are common in virtually all humans. Most humans acquire mites shortly after birth, and they form part of the normal commensal skin faunae for the rest of their life, and the number of mites on everyone's skin increases with age. Mites transfer between people by skin and hair contact, particularly by sleeping with a person in close contact at night.

While most people have mites, it tends to become a problem when a high population density is found and can then become a nightmare for the sufferers' skin and scalps.

Symptoms

A high Demodex infestation is characterised by itching, inflammation and a variety of skin disorders.

Studies show the Demodex hair mites to be a leading contributor to numerous types of skin complications; for example, these mites have been identified as a leading contributor to ageing and rough skin, wide and large pores, hair loss, atopic dermatitis and dermatosis.

Common symptoms of Demodex include:

ROSACEA

BLEPHARITIS (inflammation of the edge of eyelids)

HAIR LOSS

REDNESS AND DISCOLOURATION

THINNING HAIR

ACNE AND BLACKHEAD

DANDRUFF

RASH AND ITCHING

All these symptoms indicate a high population density of mite is present and needs to be treated effectively. It requires immediate, aggressive treatment and only with the right product and protocol can Demodex be eliminated.

FAQS

Why won't Tea Tree Oil kill Demodex populations in humans?

Tea tree oil is currently a popular method of trying to combat Demodex. However, it's not very effective nor successful. The answer to this is quite simple: because of the nature of where Demodex mites live (deep under the skin), tea tree oil is not enough to ensure the full elimination of Demodex mites populations on human skin.

To eliminate Demodex mites fully, skin needs to be treated for a minimum of 3 months. This is because mites lay their eggs deep under the follicles, and it is crucial to treat for the correct amount of time and ensure all generations have been targeted so that the infestation is, in fact, gone.

Why is it important to treat Demodex mites in humans?

Even when there are no visible signs of Demodex activity it is worth to treat yourself and eliminate the mites before it can become a real problem. It doesn't take much for a mite population to grow out of control – stress, becoming sick or suffering a weakened immune system could all lead to a Demodex infestation. Another reason to treating these mites is they are contagious. Infected people with no visible signs can also transmit the mites to other people unknowingly. This puts those around you with a compromised immune system at a huge risk.

Why is my hair mite population out of control?

Many of our clients who respond adversely to mites suffer things like high stress levels, or other medical conditions that affect their immune system. A Demodex population density can soar very quickly when the immune system is unable to respond sufficiently to keep the mite population in check or because of their inflammatory response to microbe or waste products associated with the mites.

Where did I catch Demodex?

The process of acquiring microbes is a lifelong activity and begins the moment we are born when we become a bacterial sponge, and begin picking up microbes that contribute to our health and ability to survive. At first there are only a few mites, but as we grow older, our personal mite population increases.

How is Demodex affecting my skin?

Studies show the Demodex hair mites to be associated with numerous types of skin complications, for example the mites have been identified as a leading contributor to hair loss, ageing skin, rough skin, wide pores, red nose, pimples, acne, rosacea, freckles, spots, fine wrinkles, atopic dermatitis, itching, dermatosis, rash, blepharitis, discoloration on the face and other skin conditions.

How come I don't know about Demodex mites?

The fact is that even scientists don't know everything about these mites yet. Not until recently is the medical and health industry starting to acknowledge that Demodex mites are largely unrecognised and underestimated. Considering how common these creatures are, there's still so much we don't know about them, and this is probably a contributing factor to why most people don't know anything about them at all. This is one of the main reasons Ungex wants to educate people and offer a solution to the many people suffering from Demodex.
